Asiahood Theology is a theological movement that emerged in the early 21st century in the context of the Asian diaspora. It is rooted in the experiences and perspectives of Asian Christians who have migrated to Western countries and seeks to articulate a Christian theology that is relevant to their unique experiences.

The term "Asiahood" was first coined by theologian K.K. Yeo in his book The Bible and the Future of Asia (2004). Yeo argues that the Asian diaspora is a new and distinct reality that requires a new and distinct theological approach. He proposes a theology that is rooted in the experiences of Asian Christians and that is attentive to the challenges and opportunities that they face in their new homelands.

Asiahood Theology has been developed by a number of scholars, including Peter Phan, Anthony Lee, and Grace Ji-Sun Kim. Phan, a Vietnamese American theologian, has written extensively about the challenges and opportunities of Asian immigrants in the United States. Lee, a Korean American theologian, has developed a theology of "diaspora missiology" that focuses on the role of Asian Christians in sharing the gospel with their new neighbors.

Kim, a Korean American theologian, has written about the importance of Asian women's voices in the development of Asiahood Theology. She argues that Asian women have a unique perspective on the experiences of Asian immigrants and that their voices need to be heard in the development of a theology that is relevant to them.

Asiahood Theology is a rapidly growing movement that is having a significant impact on the global Christian community. It is a theology that is rooted in the experiences of Asian Christians and that is attentive to the challenges and opportunities that they face in their new homelands. Asiahood Theology is a theology of hope that offers a vision of a future in which all people are able to live in harmony and peace.

The Guam Years

The Guam Years were a significant period in the development of Asiahood Theology. In the early 1990s, a group of Asian theologians gathered on the island of Guam to discuss the challenges and opportunities of Asian immigrants in the United States. This group of theologians included K.K. Yeo, Peter Phan, Anthony Lee, and Grace Ji-Sun Kim.

The Guam Years were a time of intense discussion and debate. The theologians who gathered on Guam were from different backgrounds and had different perspectives on the challenges and opportunities of Asian immigrants. However, they were all united in their belief that a new and distinct theological approach was needed to address the needs of Asian Christians in the diaspora.

The Guam Years were a watershed moment in the development of Asiahood Theology. The theologians who gathered on Guam laid the foundation for a new theological movement that is having a significant impact on the global Christian community.
