Bury My Heart at Wounded Knee is a powerful and moving account of the Lakota people's struggle for survival. Brown's writing is clear and concise, and he does an excellent job of bringing the characters to life. The novel is full of vivid descriptions of the Lakota way of life, and it provides a valuable glimpse into the culture of a people who have been marginalized and oppressed.

The Fetterman Massacre

The Fetterman Massacre was a battle between the United States Army and the Lakota people that took place on December 21, 1866. The battle was a disaster for the US Army, and it led to the deaths of 81 soldiers.

The massacre began when a group of Lakota warriors attacked a woodcutting party near Fort Phil Kearny. The soldiers were outnumbered and outgunned, and they were quickly overwhelmed. The Lakota warriors then pursued the fleeing soldiers, and they killed most of them.

The Fetterman Massacre was a turning point in the American Indian Wars. It showed that the Lakota people were not willing to give up their land without a fight. The massacre also led to the creation of the Powder River Expedition, which was a campaign to punish the Lakota people for their resistance.

Creek Mary Blood

Creek Mary Blood was a Lakota woman who was born in 1842. She was a member of the Miniconjou band of the Lakota people. Creek Mary Blood was a strong and independent woman, and she was known for her bravery and her skill as a warrior.

Creek Mary Blood fought in the Battle of the Little Bighorn in 1876. She was one of the few women who fought in the battle, and she is credited with killing several US soldiers. Creek Mary Blood was also present at the Wounded Knee Massacre in 1890. She survived the massacre, and she lived to tell the story of what happened.

Creek Mary Blood was a remarkable woman who lived through a time of great change and upheaval. She was a witness to some of the most important events in American history, and her story is a valuable reminder of the courage and resilience of the Lakota people.
